

ARKANSAS HISTORIC PRESERVATION PROGRAM

Minority Settlement in the Mississippi River Counties of the Arkansas Delta 1870-1930

By William D. Baker

Originally published by the Arkansas Historic Preservation Program in 1991.

This volume is one of a series developed by the Arkansas Historic Preservation Program (AHPP) for the identification and registration of the state's cultural resources. For more information, write the AHPP at 1100 North Street, Little Rock, AR 72201, call (501) 324-9880, or send an e-mail to info@arkansaspreservation.org.

The Arkansas Historic Preservation Program is the agency of Arkansas Heritage responsible for the identification, evaluation, registration and preservation of the state's cultural resources. Arkansas Heritage is a division of the Arkansas Department of Parks, Heritage, and Tourism.

Minority Settlement in the Mississippi River Counties of the Arkansas Delta 1870-1930

By William D. Baker

*A. Landi General Merchandise Building
Grand Lake
Chicot County, Arkansas*

Cover illustration by Cynthia Haas

CONTENTS

Introduction	3
Minority Immigration and Settlement in Arkansas: 1870-1900	4
Immigration Advocacy and Promotion	4
Black Immigration and Settlement	6
Social and Economic Conditions	6
Black Immigration to Arkansas	8
Black Education and Southland College	8
Black Segregation	9
Political Participation and Disfranchisement	10
German Immigration and Settlement	13
Italian Immigration and Settlement	14
Chinese Immigration	16
Jewish Immigration	17
Other Immigrants	18
Minority Immigration and Settlement in Arkansas: 1900-1930	18
Immigration and Settlement Trends	18
Black Immigration and Settlement	18
Tenant Farming and the Elaine Race Riots of 1919	18
Minorities and the Arkansas Timber Industry	22
The Blues	22

The Ku Klux Klan in Arkansas	23
Black Education	24
Swiss and German Immigration and Settlement	24
Italian Immigration and Settlement	25
Conclusion	26
Methodology, Goals, and Priorities	26
Bibliography	28
Endnotes	30

MINORITY SETTLEMENT IN THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER COUNTIES OF THE ARKANSAS DELTA, 1870 - 1930

I. Introduction

The end of the Radical Reconstruction period in 1874 was to allow Arkansans to turn their attention inward toward the development of their state's resources and population. In the years following the Civil War Arkansas was still considered underpopulated, and the general consensus was that increased immigration to the state could provide the impetus toward further economic growth. However, new types of immigrants were being attracted to the United States in the late nineteenth century, and the public and private efforts to attract these new immigrants to Arkansas was to have long-term effects on the state's cultural and ethnic diversity. While substantial numbers of Anglo-, Scottish-, and Irish-Americans continued to settle in the state just as they had during the antebellum period, the small but significant influx of African-Americans, Italians, Chinese, Jews, and other minority ethnic groups between 1870 and 1930 was to forever change and enrich the nature of Arkansas society.

The Arkansas Delta is characterized by a deep alluvial soil spread over a near-flat landscape that extends west from the Mississippi river until it meets the rocky foothills of the Ozark and Ouachita mountains. Some of the most fertile and flat land lies east of Crowley's Ridge in the counties straddling the Mississippi River; Mississippi, Crittenden, St. Francis, Lee, Phillips, Desha and Chicot counties (while St. Francis county does not actually border the Mississippi River, it is nevertheless being included in this study). While this region's fertile soil is more productive than any in the rest of the state, the land drains poorly and stays wet for long periods. Prior to settlement and large-scale agriculture, most was woodland or swampland, with small scattered prairies. The poor drainage created problems for early settlers, and the region has an extensive history of experiments with drainage ditches, levees and reservoirs to control the Delta's water. Major floods occurred in the Delta river counties in 1882, 1883, 1884, 1886, 1890, 1893, and 1897.¹

Before 1875, most Arkansas settlers were people of Scottish, Irish, English, or African descent who had emigrated from the older southern states east of the Mississippi River. While this general pattern continued in the years following Reconstruction, new ethnic groups began to appear in the state as well. Slavs are known to have been employed in the timber industry of Southeast Arkansas, and a major Italian colony was founded in Chicot County late in the century. A few Chinese were brought in to work on lowland cotton plantations, while others migrated to eastern Arkansas via New Orleans after having worked on the railroads in the western United States. A scattering of French, Germans, Swiss, Syrians, Greeks, and Jews also began to appear in eastern Arkansas at this time. While the new immigration was not heavy enough to change the general makeup of the population, a number of new minority immigrants came from northern states such as Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, and Pennsylvania. Others came directly from Europe or Asia.

Immigration to Arkansas was at its apex in the 1870s, when railroad development in the state was at its peak. Steamboat trade on the Mississippi River also played a role, bringing a diverse group of immigrants to the region in the late nineteenth century. This combination of ethnic groups and nationalities was eventually to make the culture and society of the Arkansas Delta distinct from other regions of the state. The flow of immigrants began to decline following World War I after the federal government placed restrictions on foreign immigration. The cycle was to be completely reversed in the 1920s and 1930s when the troubled economy and poor agricultural conditions caused an exodus in which much of Arkansas's population left the state; many never returned. The physical reminders left by these early inhabitants represent an important legacy, a testament to the contributions that these settlers made to Arkansas's heritage.ⁱⁱ

II. Minority Immigration and Settlement in Arkansas: 1870-1900

A. Immigration Advocacy and Promotion

More than half of Arkansas's immigrants in the late nineteenth century were of German, English, or Irish descent. Most settled in urban areas, with Little Rock home to 20 percent of the state's foreign born population and Fort Smith home to 10 percent. Those counties with little or no urban populations, especially those in north-central Arkansas, had correspondingly fewer foreign-born citizens.

Following the end of the Radical Reconstruction period in Arkansas the state entered a conservative era, characterized as a reaction against Republicanism and control of the state by "carpetbaggers and their Negro allies." Arkansas's leadership began to encourage railroad companies, industries, and immigrants to come to the state.ⁱⁱⁱ Increased immigration was necessary because of the disruption to the labor supply caused by the Civil War. In addition to the men killed in the war, many left the state to avoid conscription while many blacks fled to free states or to Union army camps.^{iv} Most of the state's population had been born in the United States and in 1870 only 5,026 were foreign born.^v

In 1865, the Arkansas Immigrant Aid Society (AIAS) had been formed to encourage immigration and to disseminate information about the state. This organization was broadly based and politically diverse, but ultimately ineffective. The society was irreparably factionalized by the election of 1866. The German Immigrant Aid Society was organized in Arkansas in September 1867 and began to compile data on soil types, climate, crops, and terms for the sale or donation of land from those areas of the state interested in immigration. Landowners were encouraged to donate rather than sell land to immigrants to offset the cost of travel from Europe. These early attempts at immigration advocacy ultimately amounted to little more than good intentions. A series of editorials in the Arkansas Gazette in the late 1860s noted the need for increased immigration from Europe in order to maintain a "Caucasian majority," and called on the General Assembly to take action.^{vi}

Prior to the Civil War there had been very little railroad activity in Arkansas, but in the 1870s development of a rail system for the state began in earnest. The federal government had granted thousands of acres of land to the railroad companies to encourage the development of rail lines nationwide. The railroad companies therefore were especially interested in promoting immigration to Arkansas so that settlers could buy and cultivate this land and trade and shipping could increase. Arkansas's railroad companies sent representatives to northern states and abroad, sold government land grants at low prices to homesteaders, and provided special rates for railway transportation. The implementation of the federal Homestead Act in Arkansas was one of the most successful of any state.^{vii} In 1875 railroad and real estate executives in Arkansas sponsored a tour of the state for representatives of northern and western newspapers. The reactions of the visitors were published in The New Arkansas Travellers, a book intended to further promote immigration to the state. Businessmen and farm organizations such as the Grange were also in favor of increasing immigration to Arkansas.^{viii}

In 1876, Arkansas was represented at the United States Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia, promoting the state's resources and opportunities to immigrants and their sponsors. Arkansas participated in similar events that year in Atlanta, New Orleans, and Chicago. The following year a state association was organized to promote immigration, the Southern and Western Immigration Convention was held in Little Rock, and local immigration societies began to spring up all over the state. The Arkansas State Exposition was held in 1887 to advertise the state's products and resources to businessmen and immigration sponsors, and a geological survey of the state was undertaken to accentuate the resource potential the state had to offer immigrants. In 1889 the General Assembly established the State Bureau of Mines, Manufactures, and Agriculture, one objective of which was to promote immigration to the state.^{ix}

While literature describing the resource potential and attractiveness of Arkansas was distributed throughout the nation and worldwide to attract new settlers and industries, the state experienced only moderate population growth during this period. Arkansas population increased from 802,000 in 1880 to 1,128,000 in 1890. By 1900 the population had grown to 1,311,000, one quarter of which was African-American.^x

The immigration of Germans, Poles, Italians and others of continental European descent resulted in substantial increases in Catholic and Lutheran populations in some parts of Arkansas. The few Jews in the state tended to live in the larger towns, with Jewish populations known to have existed in such Delta river county cities as Helena, McGehee, and Forrest City. Blacks in Arkansas established their own churches following Reconstruction, completing the religious separation of the races. Most followed the faith of their former masters, generally Baptist or Methodist.^{xi}

As European economies faltered in the late nineteenth century, America came to be seen as a land of opportunity. Ultimately, Arkansas was never as successful as the western states in attracting foreign immigrants entering the country in New York, especially in the late 1860s and early 1870s. Of the 25,000 who landed in New York in April 1867, only 5 were headed for Arkansas, and of the 213,000 who came to the U.S. in 1868, only 78 eventually settled in Arkansas.

B. Black Immigration and Settlement

i. Social and Economic Conditions.

Blacks constituted the largest minority group in Arkansas at the close of the Civil War. Between 1870 and 1900, Arkansas's black population grew from 122,169 to 366,856, an increase of more than 200 percent.* By the year 1900 all of the Arkansas counties bordering the Mississippi River had black majorities, with Chicot County having the highest percentage of black residents (87 percent) and Mississippi County having the lowest (51 percent). This black community was primarily agricultural; by 1900, 71 percent of black workers in the Delta counties were employed as farmers or farm laborers, 19 percent were employed in domestic or personal services (with occupations ranging from owning and managing hotels and restaurants to serving as barbers or housekeepers), 5 percent were employed in manufacturing (usually either in saw mills or as carpenters), and 3 percent were involved in some form of trade or transportation enterprise (usually either as draymen, hackers, or railroad workers). About 1 percent identified themselves as professionals; members of this increasingly powerful black middle class were primarily employed as clergymen, teachers, physicians, lawyers, and other miscellaneous professions. This latter group was located for the most part in the few urban areas of the region.^{xii}

After the Civil War, the U.S. Congress established the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, commonly known as the Freedmen's Bureau, to aid former slaves in their transition to freedom. However, the implied promise that the Bureau would oversee the redistribution of land and supplies from plantation owners to former slaves ("Forty acres and a mule") never came to pass and the economic institution of slavery was replaced with a variation on the same theme, tenant farming and sharecropping.^{xiii} Between 1880 and 1930, the number of southern workers who farmed on someone else's land grew from one-third to more than half. In the late 1860s and 1870s, destitute farmers and former slaves found themselves with little or no money and in need of land. Plantation owners, on the other hand, found themselves with plenty of land but without the monetary resources necessary to hire workers and farmers. Southern banks had little capital available to loan landowners or landless workers. All that the poor had of marketable value was their labor. The tenant farming system was created when labor was substituted for money and tenants began to trade their labor for the right to work a plantation owner's land.^{xiv}

Sharecropping developed as a unique form of tenancy, with the tenant promising a certain percentage of his crop to the landowner in exchange for land and supplies. The division of the crop was dependent on what supplies the landlord had to supply the tenant with, such as work animals, feed, seed and tools. Often the sharecropper was dependent on the landowner for food and household goods available at a plantation store in exchange for scrip. The sharecropper represented the lowest form of tenant, one who had to be supplied with all of his farming needs; often his rent to his landlord constituted more than half of his crop.^{xv}

* The growth rate for white Arkansans over the same time period was 161 percent.

Most agricultural decisions were made by the landlord, including what crops to plant, and how to cultivate, process, and market them. At the end of the year, the most the tenant could hope for was to break even, to have his share of the crop cover the costs of the supplies leased from or supplied by the landowner. The tenant was legally and societally bound to his creditors until his debt was paid; often the tenants, who were usually poorly educated if not illiterate, were cheated by their landlords and paid below market prices for their crops. Many found themselves sinking deeper into debt each year. In the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries it was estimated that as many as 100,000 families in the lower Mississippi Valley lived on submarginal farmland, unable to provide an adequate livelihood for their own families.^{xvi}

The common goal for most black farmers in the Delta river counties, whether native or emigre, was to own land. In 1875, it was estimated that about one in 20 black voters in the region had acquired land (totaling roughly 2,000 men). By 1900 this number had risen to 11,941, still a tiny minority of the total black population. Most blacks either rented land on shares or at fixed rates, or worked as annual or monthly wage laborers. In the 1870s, agricultural land could be rented from land owners for six to ten dollars per acre. It was not unknown for sharecroppers to contract for as much as one-half of their crop. In 1875 it was estimated that a sharecropper farming 50 acres and utilizing the labor of his entire family might bring in $750 for the season.^{xvii}

Conditions for black farmers in the late nineteenth century were especially bleak. Cotton, the predominant cash crop in the region, was selling for fifteen cents a pound in the early 1870s, but by 1895 a world glut had forced cotton prices down to just six cents a pound. As cotton prices fell, sharecroppers and tenant farmers found themselves unable to pay off their debts to landowners at the end of the year. Black farmers increasingly became mired in perpetual indebtedness, a cyclical system of dependency that had the effect of immobilizing them and binding them to the land. The nature of the sharecropping and tenant farming system ensured that the value of black property holdings remained far behind that of whites. In 1890, the average value of a black farmer's holdings stood at $823, less than half of the $2,065 average for whites. The annual farm product of a white farm averaged $599, as opposed to just $374 for black farms. Inadequate educational opportunities and high rates of illiteracy also placed burdens on black Arkansans and served to consign many to lives of perpetual agricultural labor or as unskilled workers. In 1900, 43 percent of black Arkansans were illiterate, as compared to 12 percent of the state's white citizens.^{xviii}

In 1883, more than 100 of the state's black leaders met in Little Rock at a convention originally intended as a promotion for Chester A. Arthur's renomination as the Republican presidential candidate in 1884. The meeting turned into more than just a pro-Arthur gathering, however, as the delegates used the convention to discuss what they perceived to be the deteriorating condition of blacks in Arkansas. The convention identified three major issues that were seen as critical to black progress: economic freedom and independence through land ownership, improved educational opportunities, and equal education under the law.^{xix}

In 1869, Tabbs Gross began publication of the Arkansas Freeman, a newspaper dedicated to improving conditions for blacks in Arkansas. One goal of the paper was to encourage black immigration to Arkansas from the states east of the Mississippi. A group of radical whites with the same goal founded the Colored Immigrant Society in the early 1870s, but the movement never got off the ground. The Patrons of Husbandry, better known as the Grange (founded near Helena in Phillips County in 1872), was also a major advocate of black immigration to the state during this period. Numerous black fraternal organizations were founded during this period, including the Odd Fellows, the Knights of Tabor, the Sons of the Agricultural Star, and the Mosaic Templars. At least eight newspapers with black editors began publication during these years.

ii. Black Immigration to Arkansas

After the Civil War, many former slaves immigrated to Arkansas by train, boat or wagon; some even walked. Some ex-slaves immigrated to re-unite families that had been separated before the war or as a result of the war. Most were farmers, and several states with labor shortages competed to attract these workers. Arkansas and Texas offered the best wages for top field hands, ranging from $15 to $25 per month, much better than the $10 to $18 per month that was standard in Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, and Louisiana. Laborers who immigrated to Arkansas generally fared better than their counterparts who remained in the older southern states. Some plantation owners even provided transportation for these new field hands and families, and numerous state and private agencies were formed to encourage black immigration.^{xx}

Plantation owners typically did their own recruiting of black immigrants or hired agents to recruit sharecroppers for them. Blacks were recruited in large groups or as families, while others simply emigrated on their own. Outrageous promises and stories about Arkansas were common in enticing these immigrants. One account of Arkansas told of hogs walking around with knives and forks stuck in their backs, begging to be eaten, while another told of how "the cotton grows so big...you could sit on a limb and eat dinner." To many impoverished and uneducated blacks, Arkansas must truly have seemed a land of opportunity, the "Promised Land." While some were subsequently dissatisfied with their lives in Arkansas, others were able to accumulate land, build homes, and become fairly prosperous. In one eight-year period, one former slave bought 503 acres of land; later in life he left half to his children and sold the rest.^{xxi}

iii. Black Education and Southland College

Between 1869 and 1870 the proportion of black children attending public schools in Arkansas increased from 28 percent to 50 percent. These gains were for the most part erased with the end of Reconstruction and the closing of black schools in 1874 and 1875. The dismantling of the Freedmen's Bureau and the transferral of schools to the southern states led to decreased funding for black education. By 1876, black school attendance was only 8 percent of the school age population, but attendance returned to 50 percent by 1890. The literacy rate for blacks ten years old or older in 1890 was 46.1 percent; only three other southern states had higher percentages.^{xxii}

Arkansas was one of only two states (Texas was the other) to actually have integrated schools before integration was legal or acceptable. In 1864, Southland College was founded to serve black youths of the Delta, specifically those children of slaves who had been orphaned, abandoned, or lost by their parents as a result of the Civil War. The college was founded in Helena (Phillips County) by the Religious Society of Friends, better known as the Quakers, a denomination with intense objections to slavery. The exact location of the original campus in Helena is unknown.^{xxiii}

Federal officers and soldiers of the 56th United States Colored Infantry Regiment purchased a tract of land northwest of Helena in 1866 and deeded it to the Indiana Yearly Meeting of Friends, a northern Quaker group active in black charity efforts in the south. The original tract included about 167 acres, 80 of which formed the main part of the Southland campus. In 1869, the school added high school courses, and in 1872 Southland was organized as a college. The first class, consisting of Chandler Paschal, Emma Lancaster, and Jerry Cross, graduated in 1876.^{xxiv}

In 1880, Southland added the first black teachers, all Southland graduates, to its faculty, making the school one of the first in the south to feature an integrated faculty. By 1886 the campus consisted of five permanent buildings and enrolled almost 300 students. The institute began falling on hard times in the early twentieth century, with declining enrollments and financial difficulties. Control of the college shifted to the Masons and later to the African Methodist Episcopal Church before it finally closed in 1935. In its heyday, Southland College had exerted a great influence on the culture of the Delta, graduating future black leaders from Mississippi, Louisiana, Tennessee and Arkansas.^{xxv}

iv. Black Segregation

Limited racial separation and segregation began in Arkansas soon after the Civil War. Blacks withdrew from white churches and began to form their own congregations where they could develop their own styles of service and leadership. A segregated school system was established during Reconstruction with no recorded protest from the black community. Despite these developments, however, Arkansas society in the 1870s retained a degree of racial integration and tolerance that would be unthinkable in later years. At times, the situation approximated the much-feared level of "social equality."^{xxvi}

In 1873, the last Reconstruction legislature in Little Rock passed a strong civil rights bill addressing public accommodations, including public carriers, hotels, saloons, restaurants, and "places of public amusement." Owners and proprietors of such properties were required to provide all patrons with equal services at equal cost, regardless of race. Penalties for failure to comply included stiff fines and imprisonment. The bill also directed school districts to furnish black children with facilities equal to those of whites. This law, usually unenforced in later years, nevertheless remained on the books for 34 years until it was repealed in 1907.^{xxvii}

In the 1880s, agricultural depression and economic tensions helped to fuel an increase in racial prejudice in Arkansas. Perhaps due to their relative nearness on the social scale, prejudice was strongest among poor whites who saw blacks as rivals and competitors for scarce jobs and opportunities. Upper-class southerners, usually familiar with blacks having grown up on plantations during the years of slavery, held somewhat different attitudes toward racial issues. This attitude often approached an aristocratic paternalism toward black workers, especially their house servants. This attitude of superiority often engendered resentment by blacks, however.^{xxviii}

After Reconstruction, it was these conservative planters who began to engage in limited political cooperation with blacks in the "black counties" of eastern Arkansas through the fusion system. Blacks benefitted from this relationship in that they gained at least some voice in state and county government, while conservative whites were able to utilize the black voting bloc to maintain their power and positions. The agrarian revolt of the late 1880s and early 1890s shattered this relationship, as fearful Democratic leaders began appealing to poor whites and their demands for segregation laws to "keep the Negro in his place." These appeals to racial prejudice served to divert attention from the pressing economic issues dividing white voters. By uniting white voters in this way, Democrats were able to survive the threats posed by the Populist agrarian movement. Republicans found that they could not simultaneously run campaigns based on xenophobia and racism and still maintain a close alliance with blacks at the local level. The GOP was forced to end its political relationships with blacks.^{xxix}

The Populist movement that swept southern and western states in the late 1880s was felt in Arkansas as well. At a state convention in Little Rock, Arkansas Populists endorsed the party's national platform and appealed to the state's small farmers for support. The movement was particularly egalitarian for its day, despite the fact that most of the white members were those among whom racial prejudice was highest. The movement maintained that white and black farmers faced the same problems and difficulties, and thus should stand together to confront the entrenched political hierarchy of the state. The Populist ideology held that it was the farmers and workers who were the creators of America's wealth, while the bankers and middlemen were societal parasites. Needless to say, the Arkansas Democratic machine viewed the Populists as a threat and eventually adopted some of its tenets to defuse the movement in the mid-1890s, albeit not those advocating racial equality.^{xxx}

v. Political Participation and Disfranchisement

Many black citizens of the Delta river counties were able to rise above the pervasive poverty and prejudice of their era to distinguish themselves. Between 1874 and 1892 at least 47 blacks held seats in the General Assembly, while two served in the state Senate. Many more held positions at the county level. Black politicians of the late nineteenth century soon found that they had to align themselves with a major party and cooperate with white leaders to have any success. Under this system of "clientage" or "fusion politics" a black politician would establish ties to a white officeholder and agree to organize and deliver the black vote. In return, the black politician received the patronage and support of the local white political establishment.

While this system might appear exploitative and unsavory, it did succeed in bringing several black community and political leaders to the forefront and allowed for more black representation in state and local government than Arkansas was to know for many years after the disfranchisement of the 1890s excluded most blacks from active participation in politics.^{xxxi}

Between 1870 and 1892 several influential black politicians and leaders rose to prominence. William L. Copeland of Crittenden County, the Republican candidate for Secretary of State in 1876, was described by a Democratic newspaper as "a well-posted parliamentarian, a fluent and rather graceful talker, and withall a man of good political information." The 1876 general election saw eight blacks elected to the General Assembly, including Barry Coleman and J. N. Donohoo (Phillips County), James Wofford (Crittenden County), and Crocket Brown (Lee County). In addition, Anthony L. Stanford of Phillips County was elected to the state senate. Of this group, six were farmers, one was a lawyer and one listed his occupation as physician/preacher. None were wealthy or owned land; the average personal property holdings per man amounted to just $116, less than one-half the state average of $239. The average age of the legislators was 38.^{xxxii}

By 1890, black representation in the House had grown to eleven, including Henry A. Johnson (Chicot County), John H. Carr and J. N. Donohoo (Phillips County), G. W. Watson (Crittenden County), and R. C. Weddington (Desha County). George Walthorn Bell served the district including Desha and Chicot counties in the Senate. The rising strength of the black middle class during this time is apparent when comparing the black General Assembly delegation in 1876 and 1890. Occupations among the 1890 legislators included one preacher, five teachers, one lawyer, and one grocer. The 1890 legislators were also better educated than their 1876 predecessors had been; two had attended college (both at Alcorn College in Mississippi), two had high school diplomas, and two had completed the common school curriculum (roughly the equivalent of an eighth-grade education). The average age of the 1890 black legislators was 31, eight years younger than their 1876 predecessors. Arkansas's black political leaders had changed to reflect the community they represented.^{xxxiii}

One of the most powerful of Arkansas's black leaders of the late nineteenth century was J. Pennoyer Jones of Arkansas City (Desha County). Born in Virginia in 1842, he eventually wound up in Arkansas City and established a law practice. By the time he entered politics in the mid-1870s he already had a reputation as a successful businessman, railroad speculator, and developer. In 1874, Jones allied himself with Henry Thane, the chairman of Desha County's Republican organization. Jones was elected to the Arkansas Constitutional Convention of 1874, defeating the Democratic candidate Xenophon Overton Pindall of Arkansas City. Later that year, Jones was elected sheriff of Desha County and eventually became county clerk. By 1890, Jones was elected county judge of Desha County and was a frequent delegate to many state and national conventions. Despite his connections with the fusion system, Jones was known as a hard-working politician, not a pawn of the Thane machine. In representing his constituents, Jones is credited with exerting enough force and influence to push the Arkansas Republican party into supporting at least some issues of black interest.^{xxxiv}

Black political participation increased significantly during the years after the Reconstruction period. The 1888 elections saw an increase in the number of black officeholders elected in those counties with black majorities. These gains were consolidated in the 1890 elections, but the growth of black political power and voting strength began to provoke a backlash among conservative white Democrats. Fraud became an acceptable tactic to use in keeping Republicans and blacks out of power. During the summer of 1888, violence broke out in Crittenden County, which had four times as many black voters as white. Armed whites captured black county officials and transported them across the Mississippi to Memphis, leaving the local election machinery in the hands of Democrats.^{xxxv}

The relatively narrow margins of victory accorded the 1888 Democratic gubernatorial candidate, James P. Eagle, scared the state Democratic party into pursuing measures to limit the effectiveness of its opposition by weakening the Republican party and disfranchising black voters. By the end of the century, all of the political gains that blacks had realized had been lost and most were effectively excluded from participation in the political process. In disfranchising blacks, the state's Democratic establishment used political rhetoric and appeals to racial prejudice to heighten tensions and to cleave the black and white lower classes.^{xxxvi}

In 1891, the General Assembly began to take up a series of segregationist bills, beginning with a separate coach law requiring segregated facilities on all railway cars operating in the state. This measure was vigorously protested by black leaders all over the state as a direct attack on the civil rights of black citizens. In the House, J. N. Donohoo sarcastically called on his white counterparts to pass not only the separate coach law, but other segregationist measures so that blacks would realize that there were "two races in Arkansas that had nothing in common with each other." Despite opposition from black delegates, the separate coach law passed the General Assembly and became law. In the House, only two whites sided with the black legislators; in the Senate, only one white voted with Senator Bell.^{xxxvii}

With the passage of the separate coach law, other segregationist legislation seemed justified and appropriate, and the idea that blacks should therefore also be excluded from participation in the political process followed naturally. Numerous revisions to the state's electoral laws eventually served to ensure that elections, even in Republican areas where fusion politics had benefitted black politicians, were essentially controlled by Democrats. These electoral changes facilitated the passage of a poll tax amendment to the state constitution submitted to voters in the 1892 general election.^{}

The effects of this sudden surge of racist and segregationist legislation could be seen in the effects of the 1892 elections. The power of the black electorate was seriously undermined by the new electoral laws, so that in the fifteen majority black counties, the Republicans carried only two. Republican balloting dropped from almost 26,000 votes in 1890 to just 9,061 in 1892. Black county officials were defeated even in the heart of the state's black belt, and only four black legislators were elected to the 1893 General Assembly. Desha County saw the election of its first straight Democratic ticket since the Civil War, and similar upsets were registered in the other Delta river counties. In Chicot County, where black voting fell by one-half, the local white newspaper proudly proclaimed "After Negro Rule for Twenty-Eight Years Democracy on Top."^{xxxviii}

What was left of black electoral power was pared away by subsequent legislation through the decade. The adoption of a white Democratic primary later in the decade effectively completed the disfranchisement of blacks from the political process. The results of these new electoral procedures had profound and immediate impacts on Arkansas politics. The total number of voters in 1890 versus 1894 reveal a drop of 65,000 votes in the latter election, almost one-third less. The greatest gains for Democratic candidates came in six predominantly black counties, regaining control of these county governments for the first time since the Civil War. With no constituency to call on, black leaders became unimportant even to the Republican party, which became increasingly segregationist itself. To protest the increasingly "lily white" character of the Arkansas Republican party, black Republicans in the late nineteenth and early twentieth century began to field their own "black and tan" candidates; though this succeeded in splitting the Republican vote, the Democratic machine was never in any danger, and no "black and tan" candidate succeeded in winning office. The process of disfranchisement was essentially complete by 1905.^{xxxix}

^{}Surprisingly, many heavily black precincts and counties passed the poll tax amendment. Moore speculates that this is due to the fact that the amendment's supporters campaigned for its passage as a means of increasing revenues for the common school fund, bypassing its racial implications. Nevertheless, there were questions as to whether or not the amendment had received the necessary majority of votes required in the constitution. A second poll tax amendment received the necessary majority in 1908.

In 1906, the state Democratic Central Committee, under the leadership of Governor Jeff Davis, ordered the use of white primaries throughout the state. Unlike many other southern states, Arkansas never resorted to such electoral requirements as literacy tests, grandfather clauses, or property requirements to limit black voting.^{xl} In 1928, many of Arkansas's black leaders were active in the presidential campaign of former New York Governor Alfred E. Smith, who they claimed had promised them black participation in Democratic primaries should he be elected.^{}

C. German Immigration and Settlement

Germans, Swiss and Austrians were considered to be among the most desirable of immigrants because of their reputations for hard work and industriousness. Despite the fears in some circles that such immigration would lead to an unacceptably high influx of Roman Catholics to the state, active recruitment of these groups began in earnest in 1874.^{xli} Most settled in areas of the state outside the parameters of this study, such as Stuttgart and Wiederkehr Village. However, some German immigrants are known to have located in Arkansas City (Desha County) and it is likely that more settled in other areas of the Delta River counties.^{xlii}

A group of prominent German merchants in Little Rock organized the German Immigrant Aid Association in July of 1870 to prepare for the increase in German immigration that was expected to result from the end of the Franco-Prussian War. When the expected deluge of immigrants failed to materialize, the association disbanded. In 1872, Little Rock's German community organized a more energetic advocacy group, the German-American Association for the Promotion of Immigration and the Maintenance of German Habits and Customs. Another German immigration group, the Immigration Aid Society, was organized later in the decade.

Meanwhile, events in Europe conspired to encourage German emigration to the Americas during the 1870s. Throughout the decade Otto von Bismarck was conducting a campaign to eradicate the Roman Catholic Church in his newly unified nation, and these pressures combined with the effects of the general depression which gripped the nation between 1873 and 1874 to create a bottleneck as disillusioned Germans who wanted to leave found that they could not afford to do so. When the German economy improved in the late 1870s the floodgates were thrown open and the United States experienced a sudden surge in German immigration. German and Swiss immigration to Arkansas was at its apex during the period 1878 to 1883. Austrian immigration to the state was minimal, constituting only 1 percent of the total immigration during the 1870s and 1880s.^{xliii} By 1900, one-quarter of Arkansas's foreign-born population was German.^{xliv}

^{} Smith's running mate was Arkansas's U.S. Senator Joseph T. Robinson.

D. Italian Immigration and Settlement

Italians began to arrive in the U.S. in large numbers after 1880, nearly all of them fleeing poverty and in search of economic opportunity. In 1880, Italy's small farmers were still experiencing the economic after-effects of Italian unification, and the ill-equipped Italian government was faced with the daunting task of developing a third-rate nation amidst the more powerful modern economies of Western Europe. To become more competitive, the Rome government embarked on a massive industrialization and taxation program that resulted in disproportionately higher taxes being levied on the nation's lower classes. Meanwhile, Italian landowners took advantage of the agricultural labor glut by paying low wages and charging outrageous rents for land. U.S. tariffs designed to protect the California and Florida citrus industries hurt the already depressed Italian fruit industry. Faced with all of these pressures and with little prospect for conditions improving, many Italian farmers and their families were forced to flee to the New World.^{xlv}

Between 1880 and 1915 nearly four million Italians immigrated to the United States. Most were northern Italians who had sold their family farms and most of their possessions to finance their journeys. Unlike some other immigrant groups, Italians tended to immigrate in extended family groups rather than as groups of individual unmarried men. Upon arrival in the U.S., most sought out Italian colonies or communities where they could work for themselves and eventually own their own land.

Italian families preparing to emigrate to the United States were exposed to numerous advertisements and immigration agents from North and South America, with both legitimate and illegitimate promises about the areas and interests they represented. Immigrants recruited by legitimate agents representing such interests as American railroads or large landholders in the southern U.S. were generally able to fulfill most of their promises; at the very least, the immigrants would have work available on their arrival at their destination. However, the majority of poor Italians taken advantage of through false promises found themselves stranded in the urban seaports of the northeastern United States.^{xlvi}

In the late nineteenth century, Bishop Scalabrini of Piacenza, Italy, organized the St. Raphael Society, a support organization for Italians emigrating to the Americas, with the goal of keeping "alive in the hearts of the emigrants love of the motherland together with love of their faith." Scalabrini was the first high Roman Catholic official to mobilize the church as an official source of immigrant support. The Society worked in the major ports of Italy where immigrants gathered before leaving, providing spiritual, financial, and medical aid, legal assistance with labor contracts, and advice and information on what to expect in the Americas. Later, the Society arranged to have a priest waiting to meet immigrants on their arrival at their destinations.^{xlvii}

Pietro Bandini was a young Italian priest who arrived in New York City in 1891 to establish the St. Raphael Society there. Bandini believed that cities had a corrupting influence on the immigrants he was charged with protecting, leaving them pessimistic and cynical. The only hope for the Italian immigrant in America was to be found outside the cities in the agricultural heartland of the continent. Bandini held a romantic and idealistic faith in the land and wanted to establish Italian agricultural colonies in the South and Midwest.^{xlviii}

Such a plan had been put forth in the late 1880s by Austin Corbin, a New York stockbroker. Corbin enlisted the help of Prince Ruspoli, the mayor of Rome, to help establish an Italian agricultural colony in the southern United States. Ruspoli agreed to recruit 100 families from northern Italy and send them to the U.S. In 1887, Corbin purchased 4,000 acres of land in Chicot County and named the area Sunnyside. On November 8, 1895 700 Italians left the port of Genoa on the chartered steamship "Chateau Yquem"; they arrived in New Orleans 18 days later. The Sunnyside colony provoked nationwide controversy almost immediately as critics contended that the federal law prohibiting contract labor made Corbin's project illegal. Corbin had to prove that his representatives in Italy had not forced the immigrants into signing contracts turning them into indentured servants. The resulting red tape necessary to prove that the immigrants were indeed colonists and not simply cheap labor for Corbin prevented the party from arriving in Chicot County until December 4, 1895.^{xlix}

Corbin's plans for Sunnyside called for each immigrant family to receive 20 acres and enough tools and supplies to begin farming. A company store was established and the colonists were issued coupons to make purchases. The farmers were to raise cotton and sugar cane under the supervision of overseers working for Corbin's Sunnyside Company. The sale of crops were to be applied against the cost of the farms in payment to Corbin, and in 21 years the colonists would receive title to their land.¹

The immigrants were essentially treated as tenant farmers by the Sunnyside Company, told what and when to plant, how much to sell, and how much to give to the company. Instead of the 20 acres each family had been promised, most were only allowed to use 12, too little for even subsistence farming, much less cash-crop agriculture. This agricultural system was completely alien to that the colonists had known in northern Italy, where most had been engaged in subsistence or truck farming. The colonists had little experience in growing non-food crops. Additionally, old village and provincial rivalries had been transplanted to the U.S. and it was often difficult to get the colonists to cooperate with one another. As all of these problems worsened, the colonists grew increasingly dissatisfied with their lives at Sunnyside.ⁱⁱ

Conditions at Sunnyside worsened when Austin Corbin died in 1896 and his heirs lost interest in the Chicot County project. The company never completed a promised drainage system for the community, resulting in a malaria outbreak among the Italian immigrants and widespread flooding that ruined that year's cotton crop. With no money for either medicine or food, more than 100 colonists died from malaria or malnutrition over the next year.ⁱⁱⁱ

In 1897, Father Bandini accompanied a second wave of Italian immigrants to the Sunnyside colony. He had been charged by his superiors in the St. Raphael Society with stabilizing the colony and establishing a parish. He spent most of the following year combating the malaria outbreak, mediating disputes between colonists, attempting to stabilize and improve crop production, and generally trying to bring order to the troubled community.ⁱⁱⁱⁱ

When Bandini himself fell ill later that year, he retreated to the Ozarks to recuperate. Realizing that the Ozark climate and topography was better suited to the needs and culture of his northern Italian charges, he returned to Sunnyside with plans for a mass exodus. Few Italians remained at the colony when Father Bandini returned; most had fled to surrounding states, to South America, or back to Italy. Thirty-five families left with Father Bandini on February 17, 1898, and eventually founded the community of Tontitown in Washington County, Arkansas. A few Italian families remained in Chicot County, however, where their descendants remain. Even after his move to Tontitown, Bandini continued to visit Sunnyside several times a year to look after the spiritual needs of the Italians that remained.^{liv}

In 1902, Bandini wrote to Bishop Fitzgerald in Little Rock, asking him to send an Italian priest to serve the Italians at Sunnyside. With Fitzgerald's approval, Bandini then wrote to the Bishop of Senigallia in the province of Ancana, Italy, for a priest. A Father Galloni left Genoa September 14, 1903, en route to Sunnyside. After first visiting Father Bandini in Tontitown, Galloni arrived in Chicot County in late December, where he boarded with one of the Italian farmers. For more than a year, one room served as Galloni's bedroom, study, and church.^{lv}

In 1905, Galloni and the Italian congregation began construction of a new church building in Lakeport, near Sunnyside, with the help of Bishop Fitzgerald and two of his Protestant friends. In 1912, Galloni moved to Lake Village, where some of the Italian families from Sunnyside had relocated. Galloni eventually oversaw the establishment of another church and a parochial school in Lake Village.^{lvi}

E. Chinese Immigration

During the labor-scarce 1870s, cotton planters imported Chinese laborers to work their fields, while others came to work on the railroads. Most Chinese in the Delta came via New Orleans and the Mississippi River. The influx of blacks from east of the Mississippi resulted in most Chinese agricultural workers leaving the region. Those that remained established a Chinese-American culture substantially different from those found on the east and west coasts of the United States.^{lvii}

In the late 1800s, U.S. law allowed male Chinese laborers into the country, but banned Chinese women. Some of the earliest Chinese immigrants married black women, but as they came to better understand the power-structure of the late nineteenth century South, this trend died out. One Chinese who married a black woman in Mississippi reportedly sent their children back to China to spare them from the racism that was so prevalent in the Delta. Like blacks, Chinese in the Delta were segregated from whites until after World War II and refused access to white churches, schools, hospitals, hotels, and restaurants. Many became small grocers serving black neighborhoods.^{lviii}

Delta Chinese, or Hon Yen as they called themselves in Cantonese, erected a society unlike that of any other Chinese enclave in North America. There were no substantial Chinatowns in any Delta cities, nor were there any of the cultural accoutrements that Chinese communities on the two coasts brought to America, such as clans, tongs, gambling parlors, pagodas, and paper dragons. Historically, Delta Chinese have tended to play a subdued role in Delta society, somewhere between the Lo Mok, the blacks, and the Bok Guey, the whites.^{lix}

F. Jewish Immigration

Jews have long been a small but significant minority in the Delta river counties. Most settled in the urban centers of the region and established mercantile businesses. They arrived, for the most part, with few resources, no families, and few attachments to the area. Many were foreign-born and spoke poor English. By developing reputations as hard-working, honest, and intelligent businessmen, they quickly became valued members of their communities. Because most Jewish temples were located only in Arkansas's larger cities, most religious services and instruction were held in individual homes.^{lx}

Simmon Weiss, a merchant at Grand Lake (Chicot County), is the first Jewish immigrant known to have settled in the river counties, sometime in the late 1840s. He was followed in 1856 by Emmanuel Hoover, who began peddling merchandise to farmers in Chicot, Desha and Drew counties. Gus Waterman, who arrived in Dumas in 1875, eventually served as postmaster from 1882 to 1887. One of his sons, Julius Waterman, went on to become dean of the law school at the University of Arkansas in Fayetteville. The Waterman Hall Law Building was named in his honor.^{lxi}

Samuel Marks opened a very successful mercantile business in Arkansas City in 1885, but later left for St. Louis because there was no Jewish temple in Arkansas City. In 1897, Abraham Dreidel arrived in Arkansas City to work in Marks' store. He eventually entered business as a senior partner of Hoover and Company (with Samuel Hoover, the son of Emmanuel Hoover), a firm operating confectionery stores in Arkansas City, Dermott, and Warren. Dreidel went on to serve as mayor of Arkansas City from 1901 to 1905, and again from 1910 to 1911. He also represented the 17th District (Desha and Drew counties) in the state Senate during the 36th General Assembly as Arkansas's first Jewish senator.^{lxii}

Samuel Wolchansky arrived in Arkansas City in 1895 and established a dry goods business, which he relocated to McGehee in 1906. Wolchansky also acquired a large acreage of farmland in the area and ran his own cotton gin. Other prominent Jews in southeastern Arkansas included Charles Dante, a leading citizen of Dumas in the late nineteenth and early twentieth century, and Isadore Pinkus, who ran a dry goods business in Dermott (Chicot County). This trend continued through the early twentieth century, as more Jews settled in southeast Arkansas, establishing businesses and becoming prominent members of their communities.^{lxiii}

Nathan Weinberg, who settled in Osceola in 1888, is believed to have been the first Jewish settler in Mississippi County. A native of the Courland region in Czarist Russia (present day Lithuania), Weinberg came to Osceola after traveling across the southern United States in search of a "good location" to live. The initial reaction to Weinberg was hostile and on several occasions area residents attempted to drive him from Osceola. More tolerant attitudes prevailed, however, and Weinberg eventually became a respected community leader. His small business grew into a successful dry goods company before his death in 1904.^{lxiv}

G. Other Immigrants

Less information is available on other immigrant groups that are known to have settled in the Delta River counties. A few Greek communities are known to have been established in southeast Arkansas in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, and for a period in the 1890s sharecroppers became so scarce that Mexican labor was recruited to work on the plantations. Helena reportedly has had small groupings of Germans, Jews, Greeks, Italians, Mexicans, Chinese, and Syrians.^{lxv}

III. Minority Immigration and Settlement in Arkansas: 1900-1930

A. Immigration and Settlement Trends

The early decades of the twentieth century saw a major effort by the state of Arkansas to promote the fertile farmlands of the Delta, newly converted from swamps and forest land, among potential immigrants to the state. As the population grew and the area's resources developed, a few Delta towns began experiencing significant expansions in the late nineteenth century, offering stark contrasts to the traditional rural nature of the region.

Arkansas City (Desha County) began to flourish in the 1890s after the town of Napoleon was destroyed by the Mississippi River in 1874. To fill the subsequent vacuum, Arkansas City became a major shipping port in the early twentieth century, the first stop for steamboats heading up the Mississippi from New Orleans and Vicksburg. The city eventually became the county seat, but its initial heyday ended when the Mississippi once again changed its course and Arkansas City lost access to the river. The town shifted its focus toward the exploitation of the significant timber resources of the area, but the flooding of the Mississippi and Arkansas rivers in 1927 destroyed this industry as well. Besides the large black population in the vicinity of Arkansas City, the town is also known to have been the destination of a few German immigrants.

B. Black Immigration and Settlement

i. Tenant Farming and the Elaine Race Riots of 1919

The first World War proved to be a watershed event in terms of race relations in Arkansas. Many blacks drafted into military service and sent to fight in Europe returned home in 1918 and 1919 with an awareness and lingering resentment of their status as second-class citizens and economic underlings. The period between the world wars saw a considerable outmigration of population from Arkansas as many disillusioned blacks left the south for better-paying industrial jobs in northern cities. White landowners in the south found their positions threatened as their cheap agricultural labor supply began to dry up.

Most rural black families were forced to be essentially self-sufficient, producing most of their own food and other needs. Typically, a farmstead would include a small vegetable garden, possibly a fruit orchard, a tobacco patch, and a few cows and hogs. Corn was transported to a gristmill for grinding into meal. In parts of Arkansas, clothing and shoes were still made at home as late as 1920, and few items, such as coffee, sugar, or flour, were not produced on the farm. Because plantation owners usually did not allow any land to be used for garden plots, tenant farmers and sharecroppers tended to be less self-sufficient and were often forced to purchase staples at a plantation-owned company store.^{lxvi}

Injustice and exploitation were essential elements of the sharecropping system as it was practiced in the early twentieth century. Black tenants were routinely denied the right to make cash settlements for their crops, unable to obtain legal assistance against their landlords, and not allowed to move from their lands in search of better conditions. In 1919, it was reported that a black tenant farmer had been shot and permanently crippled by his landlord because he asked for a cash settlement for his crop.^{lxvii} Some succeeded despite the obstacles placed before them. Scott Bond, an uneducated ex-slave from Madison (St. Francis County), became one of the leading farmers and businessmen of eastern Arkansas who, in 1917, turned down an offer of $2 million for his assets.

Stresses and internal contradictions in the tenant and sharecropping systems began to be felt in the years following the first World War. Sharecroppers and tenant farmers began to agitate for better economic leverage vis a vis their landowners and for more leeway in decisions relating to the planting, harvesting, and marketing of their crops. Tensions grew as landowners began to feel threatened by these perceived encroachments on their lands, power, positions, and wealth. These tensions exploded in 1919 in what black historian John Hope Franklin called "the greatest period of interracial strife the nation ever witnessed." Race riots erupted all over the United States, in East St. Louis, Chicago, Omaha, Knoxville, Indianapolis, and Washington, DC. In the fall of 1919, they reached Elaine, Arkansas.^{lxviii}

In an effort to alleviate abuses and inequities against tenants and sharecroppers, the Progressive Farmers and Household Union of America was organized in 1919 to combat the unwritten southern maxim that prevented indebted tenants from moving to other areas in search of opportunity. The union, formed to "advance the interest of the Negro, mentally and intellectually, and to make him a better farmer," was initially led by Robert H. Hill, a 26-year-old black World War I veteran. The union was slow in gaining acceptance, so Hill tried to promote it as a fraternal order. By the summer of 1919, chapters had been organized in the Phillips County communities of Ratio, Elaine, Hoop Spur, Old Town, and Mellwood. Concerned whites began spreading rumors during the summer that the union members were storing arms and ammunition and planned an assault on the white community. Black sharecroppers demanding a more equal bargaining position were portrayed as "insurrectionists." A series of meetings were held in Helena in which black and white moderates attempted to defuse the tensions and prevent violence, but the efforts proved unsuccessful.^{lxix}

On the night of September 30, 1919, members of the Progressive Farmers Union met at the Hoop Spur church, two miles north of Elaine. White participants in the incident later claimed that the meeting was held to "withhold all cotton from the landlords and plan hostilities against them." Blacks insisted that the landlords had been apprised of the meeting and, fearful of the possible outcome of black unity, used "every means" to prevent it.^{lxx}

In Little Rock the following day, Governor Charles Brough received a telegram from

Elaine reporting "race riots here in Elaine and [we] need some soldiers at once. Several white men and negroes killed last night and this morning." Details of the rioting remain unclear and accounts of what happened changed frequently over the next several days. At some point, gunfire broke out between the black farmers gathered in the Hoop Spur church and a group of whites outside the building. The Arkansas Gazette featured the headline "Desperate Fighting between Whites and Negroes," and reported:

"Elaine at midnight was quiet after a day of fighting between organized negroes armed with high-powered rifles and sheriffs posses in the streets of that town and in the country nearby."^{lxxi}

Whites involved in the fighting included members of the Helena American Legion Post and men from Clarendon, Marianna, and Marvell. Others came from as far away as Lula, Tunica, Friars Point, and Clarksdale, Mississippi.^{lxxii} On October 2, Governor Brough declared martial law in Elaine and sent more than 500 U.S. troops by train from North Little Rock's Camp Pike to Elaine to establish order. Scores of black citizens were arrested and confined to the basement of the community's public school, while others were not allowed to move about without military passes. More troops were dispatched to Helena to prevent the lynchings of the alleged union ringleaders.^{lxxiii}

Soon after, a Committee of Seven was formed in Helena with Governor Brough's imprimatur to investigate the Elaine riots and determine what had caused them. Witnesses were interviewed, black detainees were interrogated, and it was finally concluded that:

"[t]he leaders of the Union had led the members to believe that the federal government would back them up in demanding high prices for their cotton and in seizing the land of white plantation owners. The black urban members in the county armed themselves and drilled in secret, so it was said, in preparation for an insurrection against whites. Twenty-one white landowners and merchants were to be killed immediately at the beginning of the insurrection, scheduled for October 6. The shooting of Adkins and Pratt at Hoop Spur on the night of September 30 had prematurely set off the insurrection...with the result that the authorities were able to suppress what would otherwise have been a black massacre of the white population of Phillips County."^{lxxiv}

Governor Brough accepted the findings of the committee's report, but expressed sympathy for the plight of Arkansas's black farmers and denounced lynchings and mob

violence.^{*}

In the days and weeks that followed, the riot was initially attributed to the activities of O.S. Bratton, the son of U.S. Bratton, a prominent white Little Rock lawyer who had formerly served as postmaster and as an assistant U.S. attorney. Bratton's law firm had been representing about 65 black Phillips County residents in their attempts to obtain fairer treatment and better cotton prices from their landlords. The younger Bratton and several blacks were arrested after it was "alleged that Bratton had been connected with the activities of propagandists in [Phillips] County who have been preaching the doctrine of social equality to the negroes." Bratton was also accused of involvement in the rioting and being present at the shooting of a white man. After his son was taken into custody, the elder Bratton became an important figure in the case, proclaiming his son's innocence and defending several blacks charged in the case. Charges against the younger Bratton were eventually dropped.^{lxxv}

Officially, five whites and eleven blacks were reported killed in the Elaine rioting, but some estimates place the total much higher. George Washington Davis, the acting grand secretary of Arkansas's black Masonic Lodge, reported that he paid 73 death claims to families of black lodge members killed at Elaine. In November 1919, 87 blacks were convicted by an all-white grand jury in connection with the riots, and twelve were sentenced to death for first-degree murder. No whites were sentenced or even charged in the case.^{lxxvi}

Meanwhile, several black newspapers and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) began their own investigations into the incident. Walter White, the white assistant secretary of the NAACP, launched a four-year campaign to repeal the death sentences imposed in the case. White filed a lengthy report with the U.S. Department of Justice, which provided the basis for the NAACP campaign. The results of White's investigation of the Elaine affair were published in the NAACP's Crisis magazine and in several black newspapers across the country, angering many political leaders and the state and local press in Arkansas. After his son's release, U.S. Bratton recruited counsel for the blacks convicted in the case. Colonel George W. Murphy, a reputable white lawyer noted for his criminal work, and Scipio A. Jones, a dynamic black lawyer with a successful record of challenges to the state's penal codes, agreed to represent the twelve men convicted of murder in their appeals.^{lxxvii}

After four years and the admission of new evidence and testimony, and appeals that were heard as high as the Arkansas and the United States Supreme Courts, Murphy and Jones were successful in having the twelve death sentences overturned. In addition to their victory in the courts, the NAACP had hoped to draw attention to and help to alleviate the conditions of black ^{*}Lynching was a scourge on Arkansas's black community for many years. Between 1882 and 1937, a total of 285 people were lynched or otherwise put to death without a trial, with blacks accounting for about 80 percent of this total. Lynchings were most common when a white man or woman was involved in an alleged crime by a black. In 1917, Arkansas ranked third in the nation in the number of lynchings, and in 1921 Governor Thomas McRae proclaimed the practice a disgrace to the state. As more prominent white leaders and leading newspapers denounced the practice, lynchings became less frequent in the late 1920s and early 1930s.

tenants and sharecroppers in the Delta. However, this proved more difficult and the economic and social disparities between white and black farmers in the Delta remained pervasive until the tenant farming system was largely abandoned in favor of mechanized agriculture in the late 1940s and 1950s.^{lxviii}

ii. Minorities and the Arkansas Timber Industry

Black Arkansans played a significant role in the development of the Delta timber industry, which flourished between 1880 and 1927. In 1898, forests of pine, cypress and hardwood covered more than three-quarters of Arkansas. By the mid-1920s, the lumber industry employed 60 percent of all Arkansas wage earners and nearly one half of the Delta's ten million acres of virgin forest had been cleared. Timber industry jobs were much sought after because of the better wages they offered compared to other enterprises. The Chicago Mill and Lumber Company, which owned vast tracts of forest in northeast Arkansas and in the Helena area, was a major employer of black lumbermen, as was the Helena lumber mill. In addition to blacks, ethnic Slavs and Germans were known to have worked in the eastern Arkansas lumber industry.

Timber production rose steadily during the first decade of the twentieth century, peaking in 1909 with Arkansas ranked fifth in the nation in lumber production. Logs were hauled out of the woods on railroad cars or floated downriver and mills began to spring up throughout the region. Production began to decline after this point, as the best timber had already been cut and costs began to increase. The industry was in trouble by 1925, with production only one-half its 1909 level and timber being cut at four times the rate it was being replaced. As sawmills began to close, the towns that had grown up around them were deserted. As logging lines were abandoned, Arkansas's railroad track mileage decreased from a total of 5,306 miles in 1910 to 4,826 miles in 1930.

In the early 1900s, a black logger named John C. Claybrook began clearing forest land for several black farmers around Simsboro, near the Mississippi River in Crittenden County. Working with two log wagons and teams of six or eight horses, Claybrook hauled the logs to spur lines of the St. Louis and San Francisco railroad to be shipped and sold to lumber mills. Eventually, Claybrook's holdings grew to 300 acres of timber- and farmland, a country store, and one of the largest lumber mill operations in Crittenden County. In 1927, he built a boarding house for lumbermen, levee workers, and day laborers who worked on the farmland made available after the land had been cleared. By the 1950s, Claybrook was known as one of the wealthiest black businessmen in the central Delta.^{lxix}

iii. The Blues

The blues, introduced to the Arkansas Delta in the 1920s, proved to be a powerful form of expression for poor and working-class black Arkansans. The music was considered counter-cultural, addressing such subjects as sex, obscenities, drinking and partying contrary to the teachings of the local black churches. In this respect, the blues represented the antithesis of the other major black musical style, the religiously oriented gospel music. For some, blues represents a musical symbol of the black experience in America, a valid form of American culture to be collected, studied, and anthologized.

Charley Patton, a Mississippi native, is credited with bringing the blues to Arkansas. Patton performed at honky-tonks, roadhouses, and picnics throughout the Arkansas Delta. Helena and West Helena became centers for blues music in the Delta. Helena featured a wide array of nightclubs, saloons, and jukejoints that grew up around the warehouse district and the black residential neighborhoods downtown. West Memphis later developed its own blues scene. Floyd Jones, born in Marianna (Lee County) in 1917, became an important figure during the blues' formative years. He was best known for the quality of his lyrics, which typically utilized such themes as frustration due to social and economic hardships or the loss of a mother or wife. He later became known as one of the most important of Chicago's post-war blues composers. Roosevelt Sykes, born and raised in Phillips County, is also remembered as an important blues singer, pianist and songwriter of the Delta.

Perhaps the most prominent of Arkansas's blues musicians was Sonny Boy Williamson, born Aleck "Rice" Miller in Mississippi in 1908 (earlier, by some accounts). Williamson began performing in Arkansas in the 1920s and eventually settled in Helena, where he died in 1965. The boarding house where he lived much of his life still stands.

In direct contrast with the ideals and emphases of the "devil's music," the blues, was another major black contribution to American music, gospel. Gospel music was considered much more socially acceptable in the Delta's "Bible Belt" in the 1920s. Among the notable gospel singers of the Arkansas Delta was Nathan Hayes, an Arkansas City (Desha County) native who performed in Arkansas's in-state gospel circuit from 1920 through the 1940s.^{lxxx}

iv. The Ku Klux Klan in Arkansas

The Ku Klux Klan, reorganized in Georgia in 1915, enjoyed a brief resurgence in Arkansas in the years following the first World War. Its members, alarmed by the growth of Arkansas's cities and suspicious of the numbers of Catholics, Jews, blacks, radicals, and other foreigners they imagined inhabited them, advocated government only by native-born white Protestant Americans. The Klan organized in Arkansas in 1921 with Little Rock attorney James A. Comer as the grand dragon, or state leader. The group initially concerned itself with what it perceived to be the moral failings of Arkansas society, and widespread reports of floggings and violence toward bootleggers, loafers, wife-beaters, and the immoral circulated the state in 1921 and 1922, provoking Governor Thomas McRae to declare a "Law and Order Sunday" in 1921 in an attempt to discourage the lawbreaking.^{lxxxi}

Arkansas quickly became one of the strongest Klan states, with more than 50,000 members claimed in 1924. The movement took control of the city governments of Little Rock and Fort Smith, as well as several county governments. The 1924 gubernatorial campaign saw the Klan for the first time launch a major attempt to influence the election. All but one of the announced candidates for the Democratic nomination sought the support of the Invisible Empire, but the Klan endorsement went to William Lee Cazort of Johnson County.^{*} Following the

^{*} Thomas Jefferson Terral, who would eventually win the nomination and the governor's office, so coveted the Klan endorsement that he attempted to join the Arkansas defeat of Cazort, the Klan's political influence diminished rapidly and it soon ceased to be a factor in Arkansas government.^{lxxxii}

v. Black Education

Black education in the early twentieth century tended to be inferior to that available in white schools, mainly due to the fact that black families tended to have more children than whites and owned relatively little property to tax for school funding. Whites generally proved reluctant to finance black education through their taxes, so needs remained unmet. Some black families refused to allow their children to attend school, perhaps reasoning that their labor on the farm was a more profitable pursuit.^{lxxxiii}

By 1930, Arkansas was spending less than half as much to educate a black child than it was spending to educate a white. This shortfall was alleviated somewhat by contributions from northern charities. The Julius Rosenwald Fund provided the resources to build schools for blacks in the south, while the Slater Fund helped to establish county training schools. Both the Jeanes Fund and the General Education Board were involved in training and paying teachers and conducting educational research. By 1928, 26 black high schools had been established in the state, largely with the assistance of these northern charities. Blacks made more progress in terms of education in the years following the first World War. More began to attend high school and college, illiteracy rates began falling, and black businessmen and professionals began replacing preachers as leaders in the black community.^{lxxxiv}

C. Swiss and German Immigration and Settlement

In the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, a Swiss-German community was established in Hicks (Phillips County), five miles west of Marvell. Among the families who settled in Hicks were the Inebrits, Tschabolds, Schaffhausers, Gschwends, Dubochs, Weltis, Heidelbergers, Steiners, and Freidleis. Most of the Swiss families had arrived at the established Swiss colony in Bernstadt, Kentucky, before migrating to Phillips County in 1897 when the Arkansas Midland Railroad offered good farmland in the Hicks vicinity at low prices.^{lxxxv}

William Welti was the first Swiss to arrive in Phillips County, where he made a deal with a Mr. Hornor and a Mr. Updegraff to buy farmland at $20 per acre. Rudolph Inebnit, his son Fred, and Anton and Ernest Schaffhauser came to Hicks by covered wagon, and other Swiss families soon followed by railroad. Robert Heidelberg was the first baby born to Swiss parents in Phillips County, on Christmas Day of 1897.^{lxxxvi}

During the early years of the colony, the settlers main source of income came from the sale of cord wood to the railroad and making cross ties and heading bolts. The Swiss-Arkansans also raised cotton, dairy cattle, chickens, grapes for homemade wine, and vegetables as truck crops and for their own consumption. The community originally chose the name "Waldheim" for their colony, but were forced to change it when it was found that another Arkansas community already bore the name. The town was eventually named "Hicksville" for Colonel Bob Hicks, who had a stove and heading mill nearby. The Missouri Pacific Railroad later shortened the name to "Hicks."^{lxxxvii}

Klan in 1923. The candidate's application was rejected, apparently on a technicality, and Terral began to frantically search for a chapter that would accept him. He finally succeeded in being "naturalized" by a Klan chapter in Bernice, Louisiana.

The Swiss community expanded to the nearby Barton area in 1903, when Emil Bloesch and Earnest Hauselman met with Ham and Ned Hornor to purchase land for other Swiss settlers at $20 per acre. The swampy land had proved difficult to cultivate for other farmers, but the Swiss farmers succeeded in draining and farming it. Most of the settlers were members of the Reformed Church of Switzerland, while others were either Roman Catholic or Lutheran. A Reformed Church congregation was organized at Barton in 1907, with another established in Hicks the following year. The Reverend Rudolph Steiner began to preach at the Hicks and Barton churches in 1911, always in German, until he died in 1928.^{lxxxviii}

In 1908, more ethnic Germans arrived at the colony, this time from Transylvania in what was then the Austro-Hungarian Empire (present day Romania). Among the families that arrived were those of Alfred Kummer, Gottfried Friedli, Heinrich Welti, Albert Wetter, Francis Sabatier, Simon Schell, Simon Plattner, Matthew Plattner, John Gschwend, and August Ebert. Most had been working in a steel mill in Niles, Ohio, when they were lured to Barton to work in the Premier Cotton Mill.^{**}

D. Italian Immigration and Settlement

Sicilian immigration to Arkansas began in the 1890s when Joe Marzulo and Peter St. Columbia, both from the Palermo town of Cefalu, settled in Helena. The two men, and typically those that later followed them, travelled 21 days by ship to New Orleans, where they worked unloading ship for 50 to 75 cents per day until they could afford to move on. Marzulo and St. Columbia decided to settle in Helena because of the similarity of its climate to that of Cefalu. Once established, the Sicilian men would send for their families, then other relatives and friends. The majority of Sicilian emigrants in Helena were from Cefalu, while others came from the Salerno towns of San Gregorio and Trapani.^{lxxxix}

In 1894, Nunzio Messina, Sr. left Cefalu for the Mississippi Delta, where he worked on the river boats and cane fields of Louisiana. He eventually sent for his wife and two sons and settled in Helena, selling fruit, nuts, and candies from a corner store and peddling to area farmers and laborers. The local farmers tended to dislike the peddlers, contending that they distracted the agricultural laborers. The Sicilian unfamiliarity with the English language and their use of Roman numerals were hindrances to their complete assimilation into Delta society for many years.^{xc}

A second Italian colony was established in the Phillips County community of Barton in 1905, when fifty Italians arrived to take jobs with the Premier Cotton Mill. Most left when the mill closed in 1909.^{xci}

^{}The same mill that employed most of Barton's Italian settlers; see above.

IV. Conclusion

In the spring of 1927, the Mississippi, Arkansas and other major rivers in eastern Arkansas overflowed their banks, flooding vast areas of lowlands. Eventually, more than four million acres in eastern and central Arkansas was affected, costing millions of dollars in property losses, thousands of Arkansans homeless, and 127 dead. With the coming of the Depression in the fall of 1929, it was to be almost two decades before the industry and agriculture of the Delta river counties would fully recover. Many of the minority cultural resources, the physical reminders of the settlement of these counties by blacks, Italians, Germans, and other ethnic groups were destroyed. Because the Flood of 1927 represents such an epochal event, those properties reflecting minority settlement that survived are that much more valuable as reminders of what was lost. Those properties extant stand as a testament to the contributions of minority groups to the settlement of Arkansas and the Delta river counties and to the societal and cultural enrichment of the state. They stand as irreplaceable monuments to the heritage of Arkansas.

V. Methodology, Goals, and Priorities

In May of 1990, the Arkansas Historic Preservation Program (AHPP) initiated a context-driven survey of minority properties in the Delta counties along the Mississippi River built between 1870 and 1930. It was felt that these properties were in danger of insensitive rehabilitation, deterioration, or demolition as a result of neglect, poor economic conditions or population shifts over the past half century. At the initial planning meeting in which the parameters of the project were discussed it was agreed that a number of goals would be pursued with the ultimate objective of calling attention to the importance of these properties. It was hoped that by emphasizing the importance of these properties to the understanding and appreciation of the history of minority settlement in Arkansas, the AHPP could encourage their continued preservation, protection, use, and adaptive re-use. It was decided that only the area around Lake Village (Chicot County) would be comprehensively surveyed, but that other properties within the region could be added at constituent request.

The Delta minority project involved significant interaction and cooperation between the AHPP program areas. The Survey staff agreed to locate properties on United States Geological Survey topographic maps of the Lake Village vicinity, then schedule survey trips in order to identify, photograph and document those properties that remained extant. At the same time, the agency's Preservation Planner would research and write a historic context study on the subject, to include such topics as immigration to Arkansas in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the variety of minority groups in the Delta region, the lifestyles and customs of these groups, and other relevant issues. This context would then accompany a multiple-property nomination of eligible properties to the National Register of Historic Places. Throughout the course of the Delta minority project, public input would be sought through press releases to media outlets in the counties along the Mississippi River.

Any property reflective of or associated with the history of minority settlement in the seven Arkansas counties on the Mississippi River would be considered eligible for inclusion in the context, provided that the property retained at least 51 percent of its original integrity, as determined by the professional historians and architectural historians of the AHPP's Survey and National Register staffs. Property types potentially eligible might include commercial structures, agricultural buildings, residences, cemeteries, or any other property fifty years old or older associated with minority settlement.

The survey identified approximately 120 structures dating from this period, three of which were applicable to the minority context and eligible for the National Register. Those properties that were more than 50 percent intact were recorded. Those not recorded were passed over because of alterations that substantially damaged their integrity. Integrity requirements were based upon a knowledge of existing properties and the Secretary of the Interior's Standards for Eligibility to the National Register of Historic Places. For each recorded property locations were noted on USGS topographical maps; photographs, both black-and-white prints and color slides, were taken of several elevations; computerized inventory forms, complete with plan-view drawings, were completed; and research, utilizing primary, secondary and oral history sources was conducted. Any information on research, events, or ethnic groups not covered in this study should be directed to the Preservation Planner at AHPP.

As of January 1994, a total of four properties, all in Chicot County, have been listed on the National Register of Historic Places through this context. They are the P.&J. Liberto-Rosa Portera Building on Main Street in Eudora and the G. Landi General Merchandise Building on Highway 8 at Grand Lake, both associated with the area's historic Italian settlement; the New Hope Baptist Church Cemetery, Historic Section, on St. Marys Street in Lake Village, the oldest historic resource associated with that town's African-American community; and the Sam Epstein House at 488 Lakeshore Drive in Lake Village, the ca. 1910 home of a prominent Jewish resident.

The AHPP is seeking further information on sites relevant to the minority experience in Chicot, Desha, Phillips, St. Francis, Lee, Crittenden, and Mississippi counties. Anyone with information is encouraged to write the AHPP at 1500 Tower Building, 323 Center Street, Little Rock, AR 72201 or call the agency at (501) 324-9880.

These properties represent significant physical reminders of an important period in Arkansas history, a time in which the state's population was significantly expanded and its cultural diversity enriched through immigration. By recognizing the importance of these resources to the understanding and appreciation of Arkansas history, the Arkansas Historic Preservation Program hopes to encourage the preservation, protection, continued use, and adaptive re-use of these properties.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Bradford, Gene. "Barton." Phillips County Historical Quarterly, Vol. II, No. 1 (December 1972).
- Dagget, Mala, ed. Victorian Arkansas: How They Lived, Played, and Worked. Little Rock, Arkansas: Arkansas Commemorative Commission, 1981.
- Dreidel, E. M. "Temple Meir Chayim: A Century Old Need." Programs of Desha County Historical Society. Dumas, Arkansas: Clarion Publishing Company, 1978.
- Faulkner, G. D. "Ethnography." Mississippi County WPA File, Arkansas History Commission, no date.
- Ferguson, John L., and Atkinson, J. H.. Historic Arkansas. Little Rock, Arkansas: Arkansas History Commission, 1966.
- Historical Commission of the Diocese of Little Rock. The History of Catholicity in Arkansas: From the Earliest Missionaries Down to the Present Time. Little Rock, Arkansas: The Guardian, 1925.
- Hubbell, Ken, and Lunon, Janis Kearney. The Arkansas Delta: A Historical Look at Our Land and People. Little Rock, Arkansas: Department of Arkansas Heritage, 1990.
- Lewellen, Jeffery. "Sheep Amidst the Wolves: Father Bandini and the Colony at Tontitown, 1898-1917." Arkansas Historical Quarterly, Vol. XLV, No. 1 (Spring 1986): 19-40.
- McCracken, NoVella. "Ethnography." Phillips County WPA File, Arkansas History Commission, no date.
- McKnight, O. E. Living in Arkansas. Norman, Oklahoma: Harlow Publishing Company, 1951.
- Miller, Leon C. "Thomas Jefferson Terral." In The Governors of Arkansas: Essays in Political Biography, 160-164. Edited by Timothy P. Donovan and Willard B. Gatewood. Fayetteville, Arkansas: University of Arkansas Press, 1981.
- Moneyhon, Carl H. "Black Politics in the Gilded Age, 1876-1900." Arkansas Historical Quarterly, Vol. XLIV, No. 3 (Autumn 1985): 222-245.
- Moore, Gene-Gabriel. "The Long Trail of the Hon Yen." Atlantic Magazine date unavailable: in author's possession.
- Moore, Waddy William, ed. Arkansas in the Gilded Age, 1874-1900. Little Rock, Arkansas. Rose Publishing Company, 1976.

Nash, Horace D. "Blacks in Arkansas During Reconstruction: The Ex-Slave Narratives." Arkansas Historical Quarterly, Vol. XLVIII, No. 3 (Autumn 1989): 243-259.

St. Columbia, Philip. "Sicilian Migration to Helena, Arkansas." Phillips County Historical Quarterly, Vol. IV, No. 4 (September 1966).

Van Kanel, Laura H. "Swiss Settlers at Hicks and Barton." Phillips County Historical Quarterly Vol. II, No. 1 (December 1972).

Watkins, Beverly. "Efforts to Encourage Immigration to Arkansas, 1865-1874." Arkansas Historical Quarterly, Vol. XXXVIII, No. 1 (Spring 1979): 32-62.

Wolfe, Jonathan James. "Background of German Immigration, Part I." Arkansas Historical Quarterly, Vol. XXV, No. 2 (Summer 1966): 151-182.

_____. "Background of German Immigration, Part II." Arkansas Historical Quarterly, Vol. XXV, No. 3 (Autumn 1966): 248-278.

_____. "Background of German Immigration, Part III." Arkansas Historical Quarterly, Vol. XXV, No. 4 (Winter 1966): 354-384.

ENDNOTES

- i. Ken Hubbell and Janis Kearney Lunon, The Arkansas Delta: A Historical Look at Our Land and People (Little Rock, Arkansas: Department of Arkansas Heritage, 1990), pp. 2-4.
- ii. John L. Ferguson and J. H. Atkinson, Historic Arkansas (Little Rock, Arkansas: Arkansas History Commission, 1966) p. 191.
- iii. Ibid., p. 174.
- iv. Beverly Watkins, "Efforts to Encourage Immigration to Arkansas, 1865 - 1874," Arkansas Historical Quarterly, Vol. XXXVIII, No. 1 (Spring 1979) p. 32.
- v. Watkins, ibid., p. 62.
- vi. Watkins, ibid., pp. 34-38.
- vii. Mala Dagget, ed., Victorian Arkansas: How They Lived, Played, and Worked (Little Rock, Arkansas: Arkansas Commemorative Commission, 1981), pp. 5-6.
- viii. Ferguson and Atkinson, ibid., pp. 187-189.
- ix. Ferguson and Atkinson, ibid., p. 189.
- x. Ferguson and Atkinson, ibid., p. 191.
- xi. Ferguson and Atkinson, ibid., pp. 206-207.
- xii. Carl H. Moneyhon, "Black Politics in the Gilded Age, 1876-1900," Arkansas Historical Quarterly, Vol. XLIV, No. 3 (Autumn 1985): pp. 223-225.
- xiii. O.E. McKnight, Living in Arkansas, (Norman, Oklahoma: Harlow Publishing Company, 1951), p. 198.
- xiv. Hubbell and Kearney Lunon, ibid., p. 36.
- xv. Hubbell and Kearney Lunon, ibid., p. 36.
- xvi. Hubbell and Kearney Lunon, ibid., pp. 36-37.
- xvii. Moneyhon, ibid., pp. 223-224.
- xviii. Moneyhon, ibid., p. 226.
- xix. Moneyhon, ibid., p. 235.

- xx. Horace D. Nash, "Blacks in Arkansas During Reconstruction: The Ex-Slave Narratives," Arkansas Historical Quarterly, Vol. XLVIII, No. 3 (Autumn 1989), p. 247-249.
- xxi. Nash, ibid., p. 248.
- xxii. Nash, ibid., pp. 258-259.
- xxiii. Hubbell and Kearney Lunon, ibid., p. 32.
- xxiv. Hubbell and Kearney Lunon, ibid., p. 33.
- xxv. Hubbell and Kearney Lunon, ibid.
- xxvi. Moore, ibid., p. 78.
- xxvii. Moore, ibid., p. 79.
- xxviii. Moore, ibid., p. 81.
- xxix. Moore, ibid., p. 81.
- xxx. Moore, ibid., p. 95.
- xxxi. Moneyhon, ibid., p. 228-229.
- xxxii. Moneyhon, ibid., pp. 230-231.
- xxxiii. Moneyhon, ibid., pp. 231-232.
- xxxiv. Moneyhon, ibid., pp. 232-235.
- xxxv. Waddy William Moore, ed., Arkansas in the Gilded Age 1874-1900, (Little Rock, Arkansas: Rose Publishing Co., 1976) pp. 70-71.
- xxxvi. Moneyhon, ibid., pp. 239-240.
- xxxvii. Moneyhon, ibid., pp. 241-243.
- xxxviii. Moneyhon, ibid., pp. 244-245.
- xxxix. Moore, ibid., p. 95.
- xl. Moore, ibid., p. 96.
- xli. Jonathan James Wolfe, "Background of German Immigration, Part II," Arkansas Historical Quarterly, Vol. XXV, No. 3 (Autumn 1966): p. 248.

- xlii. Hubbell and Kearney-Lunon, ibid., p. 25.
- xliii. Wolfe, ibid.
- xliv. Dagget, ibid., p. 6.
- xlv. Jeffery Lewellen, "Sheep Amidst the Wolves: Father Bandini and the Colony at Tontitown, 1898 - 1917," Arkansas Historical Quarterly Vol. XLV, No. 1 (Spring 1986): pp. 19-20.
- xlvi. Lewellen, ibid., pp. 20-21.
- xlvii. Lewellen, ibid., pp. 22-23.
- xlviii. Lewellen, ibid., pp. 24-25.
- xlix. Lewellen, ibid., pp. 26-28.
- l. Lewellen, ibid., p. 28.
- li. Lewellen, ibid., pp. 28-29.
- lii. Lewellen, ibid., pp. 29-30.
- liii. Lewellen, ibid., p. 30.
- liv. Lewellen, ibid.
- lv. Historical Commission of the Diocese of Little Rock, The History of Catholicity in Arkansas: From The Earliest Missionaries Down to the Present Time. (Little Rock, Arkansas: The Guardian, 1925), p. 101.
- lvi. The History of Catholicity in Arkansas, ibid., p. 101.
- lvii. Gene-Gabriel Moore, "The Long Trail of the Hon Yen," Atlanta Magazine, date unavailable, p. 72-74.
- lviii. Moore, ibid., p. 113.
- lix. Moore, ibid., p. 72.
- lx. E. M. Dreidel, "Temple Meir Chayim: A Century Old Need," Programs of Desha County Historical Society (Dumas, Arkansas: Clarion Publishing Company, 1978), p. 29.
- lxi. Dreidel, ibid.
- lxii. Ibid.

- lxiii. Dreidel, ibid.
- lxiv. G. D. Faulkner, "Ethnography," (Mississippi County WPA File, Arkansas History Commission, no date).
- lxv. NoVella McCracken, "Ethnography," (Phillips County WPA File, Arkansas History Commission, no date).
- lxvi. Ferguson and Atkinson, ibid. pp. 286-287.
- lxvii. Hubbell and Kearney Lunon, ibid., p. 41.
- lxviii. Hubbell and Kearney Lunon, ibid., p. 41.
- lxix. Hubbell and Kearney Lunon, ibid., p. 42.
- lxx. Hubbell and Kearney Lunon, ibid., pp. 41-42.
- lxxi. Hubbell and Kearney Lunon, ibid., p. 42.
- lxxii. Hubbell and Kearney Lunon, ibid.
- lxxiii. Hubbell and Kearney Lunon, ibid.
- lxxiv. Hubbell and Kearney Lunon, p. 43.
- lxxv. Hubbell and Kearney Lunon, ibid., pp. 43-44.
- lxxvi. Ferguson and Atkinson, ibid., p. 274.
- lxxvii. Hubbell and Kearney Lunon, ibid.
- lxxviii. Hubbell and Kearney Lunon, ibid.
- lxxix. Hubbell and Kearney Lunon, ibid., pp. 22-23. Besides his importance in the development of the Delta's timber industry, Claybrook also had a significant impact on the social and cultural history of the Delta river counties. In 1929 Claybrook began sponsorship of a new semi-pro baseball team, the Claybrook Tigers. The team participated in the National Negro Baseball League for more than a decade, recruiting and paying top wages to black athletes from all over the Delta. Among Claybrook's players was Floyd Jones, a well-known black blues musician from Brickey (Lee County) and Mound City (Crittenden County). Several other blues musicians who played at the roadhouses and clubs around Simsboro supplemented their incomes by playing ball with Claybrook's Tigers.
- lxxx. Hubbell and Kearney Lunon, ibid., pp. 47-50.

- lxxxi. Ferguson and Atkinson, ibid., pp. 265-269.
- lxxxii. Leon C. Miller, "Thomas Jefferson Terral," in The Governors of Arkansas: Essays in Political Biography, Timothy P. Donovan and Willard B. Gatewood, Jr., eds. (Fayetteville, Arkansas: University of Arkansas Press, 1981), p. 161.
- lxxxiii. Ferguson and Atkinson, ibid., p. 275.
- lxxxiv. Ferguson and Atkinson, ibid.
- lxxxv. Laura H. Van Kanel, "Swiss Settlers at Hicks and Barton," Phillips County Historical Quarterly, Vol. II, No. 1 (December 1972), p. 9.
- lxxxvi. Van Kanel, ibid.
- lxxxvii. Van Kanel, ibid.
- lxxxviii. Van Kanel, ibid.
- lxxxix. Philip St. Columbia, "Sicilian Migration to Helena, Arkansas," Phillips County Historical Quarterly, Vol. 4, No. 4 (September 1966), p. 19.
- xc. St. Columbia, ibid.
- xc. Gene Bradford, "Barton," Phillips County Historical Quarterly, Vol. II, No. 1 (December 1972) p. 9.

ARKANSAS HISTORIC PRESERVATION PROGRAM

Minority Settlement in the Mississippi River Counties of the Arkansas Delta 1870-1930

By William D. Baker

Originally published by the Arkansas Historic Preservation Program in 1991.

This volume is one of a series developed by the Arkansas Historic Preservation Program (AHPP) for the identification and registration of the state's cultural resources. For more information, write the AHPP at 1100 North Street, Little Rock, AR 72201, call (501) 324-9880, or send an e-mail to info@arkansaspreservation.org.

The Arkansas Historic Preservation Program is the agency of Arkansas Heritage responsible for the identification, evaluation, registration and preservation of the state's cultural resources. Arkansas Heritage is a division of the Arkansas Department of Parks, Heritage, and Tourism.

