Racial tension in Arkansas was high at the end of the Civil War. Though the South had been defeated and slavery was abolished, the lingering effects of slavery and racism continued. The changing economy and polarizing political climate caused social unrest, which turned into racial violence targeted at Black Arkansans. The first race riots and race wars in Arkansas followed soon after.

Racism at the turn of the century took many forms, including intimidation such as whitecapping (threatening someone with violence), nightriding (illegal acts carried out at night in disguise), and even lynching (a frequent tactic of the Ku Klux Klan). During Reconstruction especially, white mobs and supremacist groups were pervasive in Arkansas. When this violence incited larger events, they were referred to as race riots or race wars. These riots could last from one day to twenty years (as was the case in Paragould). White violence against Black people was the defining aspect of race riots, though the impetus also typically included economic or political elements.

In Arkansas, race riots typically followed three patterns based on the demographics of the area. In areas with a large population of Black people, race riots were violent and often deadly as white residents used force in an attempt to preserve the social order that favored them. The most famous case of this in Arkansas is the Little Rock riot outside Central High School in 1957, when a white mob gathered to protest desegregation. (See Little Rock Nine Topic Guide)

In places with a low population of Black people, riots consisted of white mobs trying to force out the minority Black residents by intimidation or violence. This practice of expulsion led to "sundown towns," places that were known to drive out or prohibit Black people from living there. Sundown towns were common in the northwestern part of Arkansas. The most notorious Arkansas instances of such "ethnic cleansing" occurred in Boone County in 1905 and again in 1909, when the white citizenry of Harrison forcefully drove out almost all of the town's Black residents.

The final type of race riot occurred in well-established Black communities, such as Pine Bluff, and happened frequently across the state during the Civil Rights movement. White mob violence resulted in Black residents working together to protect themselves from attacks. These defensive riots created a vicious cycle of white mobs preemptively assaulting Black people, whom they suspected of planning protests to protect themselves from these selfsame white mobs.

The deadliest race riot in Arkansas, and one of the worst racial conflicts nationwide, was the Elaine Massacre in 1919. Elaine had more Black residents than white residents, and this race riot followed the deadly pattern typical of this type of demographic. White Arkansans gathered to stop what they labeled as an insurrection by the Black residents. It is estimated that a white mob of up to a thousand people gathered in Elaine. By the end of this race riot, white mobs had indiscriminately killed hundreds of Black residents. This racial conflict was further drawn out as hundreds of other Black residents were charged with various crimes after being attacked by white mobs. This led to a long court process as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) worked with local lawyers to save Black Arkansans from the death penalty. (See Elaine Massacre Topic Guide)

Arkansas race riots were such significant events that they were often reported in newspapers outside the state. Some of the best reports of these events are dispatches from Arkansas, including first-hand accounts, printed in papers throughout the country.
