8. Significance (Page 2)

A wooden continental distributor with lint flue was added in 1911, along with a drag type, wooden-box conveyer distributor. In the late 1930's two rebuilt 70-saw stands and two rebuilt feeders were installed, and the original boiler was replaced with a new one.

Syrup-making was another service long-performed by the Goodlett gin. Sorghum and ribbon cane were crushed by a steam powered mill and the syrup cooked in a steam heated pan. A third production of the Goodlett gin was that of corn meal. A stone grist mill was used for many years to grind corn, but has now been replaced by a hammer mill. In the early days of the mill the neighborhood customers often brought their corn and sorghum to the mill on week-ends and enjoyed a sociable gathering while their meal and cane were being ground.

The last major repair on the gin plant was made in 1952 when a new set of piston rings were made by a machinist familiar with the Goodlett gin. For three generations the Musgrave family of Nashville, Arkansas did all the repair work on the engine and has kept it in running condition since its installation in 1898.

During the 1950's and 1960's the production of cotton, corn, sorghum and ribbon cane greatly declined in the Ozan area. With no cotton to gin or corn to grind the gin and mill shut down commercial production in 1966.

Though cotton gins are, of course, still in operation throughout the South, the Goodlett gin is unique in that it is steam powered. Although not in operation at this time, the unique Goodlett gin is still fully operable. It is a replica of the agricultural and commericl way of life of the rural South in the late 19th and early 20th centuries.

The old steam powered gin, commonly referred to as the Goodlett gin, stands on the Goodlett farm near Ozan, Arkansas. A principal two-storey wood building and two additional wood edifices comprise the building complex. They are located in what was a heavily wooded site adjacent to a one-half acre mill pond dug about the time the original building was constructed in 1883. The pond supplied the gin's water needs of several hundred gallons per day.

One adjacent wood building served as a shed under which wagons were weighed. It was built during the 1890's. The other building, of one-storey wood frame construction is located beside the principal structure and connected to it by a shed roof. It served as a cotton seed house for seeds removed from the cotton.

The central two-storey structure with gable roof and rectilinear plan is straddled by one-storey shed roof extensions on either side of its short axis. The buildings were constructed from timber cut from the nearby forest. The timbers were of varying sizes to accommodate the different space needs of the gin. Most timbers are cut from "heart pine." A siding of one (l") inch by twelve (12") inches pine sheathes the structures. A corrugated, galvanized sheet metal roof is in good shape, as is most of the lumber used in the original construc-The ground floor is of compacted dirt and contains tion. the main power source, a 250 horse-power steam engine, and its attendant jack shafts, pulleys and belts. The upper storey of wood frame construction contains the essential cotton ginning machinery. The supplementary operations of the gin include a feed and meal grinder and a sorghum press located on the ground floor.

Few alterations to the original structure have been made, other than minor repairs. Periodically, new equipment was added which increased the efficiency of the gin.

The State of Arkansas has recently purchased the Goodlett gin and plans are underway to relocate it at nearby Old Washington State Park. The Goodlett gin will be put back into operation to illustrate for park visitors the cotton ginning industry of the late 19th century. EE INSTRUCTION
