The Elliott-Meek House is a Greek Revival two-story frame house with five bays across the front, on both the first and second floors. The house is rectangular and two rooms deep with a center hall and stair.

The facade has a two-story porch supported by six round fluted columns. The railing between the columns is a lattice work design. The windows under the porch are triple hung with six light sashes. The windows and doors are trimmed with a cornice. There are identical doors on both the first and second story porches. They are double entry with rectangular sidelights and transoms. The doors have vertical double panels. The windows on either end of the house have plain trim and no shutters. They are double hung sash with six lights per sash.

The house exhibits Antebellum characteristics in the four square floor plan, symmetrical facade with five bays per floor, classic columns, and two-story porch and hip roof. There have been alterations, however. The three shed dormers, with windows, and the louvered roof vents are evidence of this, as is the too wide overhang of the roof. The original roof was apparently a much lower pitched hip roof set above an unusually high entablature having enormous brackets across the facade. This possibly provided servants quarters on the third floor. An old, but blurred, photograph of the house gives the appearance of a threestory structure, although the top floor was shorter than the others and had these out-of proportion brackets.

Other than the roof, however, the house is basically unchanged.
