DESCRIPTION

The Roy's Office Supply Building, facing north on the south side of the Bentonville square, has all the architectural features of typical Italianate two-story commercial properties of the late 19th century. The second floor is divided into six bays by uniformly spaced one-over-one double-hung windows, which are topped by ornate metal lintels. A pressed-metal projecting cornice with brackets and moulding defines the roof line of the building. The ground floor facade is occupied almost entirely by large display windows. An entry door is located in the second bay from the right (west) side. A narrow semi-solid door at the extreme right of the front leads to the second floor stairway. A modern business sign, too large for the space over the showcase windows, presently crosses the entire width of the building.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Criterion: CArea of significance: Architecture

The Roy's Office Supply Building was built c. 1885, a double frontage to accommodate one or two enterprises. Little modification has been made to the original front design. Even the ground floor, so often abused in similar buildings with modernization, remains as it was built. The entire front is one of the best preserved commercial facades in Bentonville's business district, a splendid sample of architectural pattern which once prevailed on all four sides of the square.
