Following the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor on December 7, 1941, many Americans feared a Japanese invasion of Hawaii, and ultimately, the West Coast. The loyalty of all persons of Japanese ancestry was immediately questioned. The Japanese-American population was concentrated in the three (3) westernmost states, especially California. This concentration was viewed as a serious threat to American security. To check the Japanese "threat", the United States Government established ten (10) isolated camps in the interior of the country for the relocation of Japanese-Americans.

Executive Order No. 9102 issued by President Franklin D. Roosevelt on March 18, 1942, created the War Relocation Authority. This board established assembly centers on the West coast to which those of Japanese ancestry were to report. Within seven (7) months most of the West coast Japanese-Americans had been loaded onto trains and moved inland to these relocation centers. Two Arkansas camps, one at Jerome in Chicot County and the other at Rohwer in Desha County, housed almost 20,000 Japanese-Americans from 1942-1945.

Construction of Rohwer Relocation Camp, the nation's easternmost relocation center, was initiated on July 31, 1942, under Director Ray D. Johnston. This 10,161 acre site included 500 acres of tar paper buildings efficiently divided into blocks. Each block contained twelve barracks which housed approximately two hundred and fifty (250) people. The twenty (20') foot x one hundred twenty (120') foot barrack buildings were each divided into six (6) apartments of different sizes. A cot, mattress and three (3) blankets were provided for each evacuee.

Each block in the camp also contained a mess hall, laundry and bath-toilet building. Two blocks were set aside Form 10-300a (July 1969) for schools, two blocks for a hospital and three blocks for office buildings. The entire camp was surrounded by barbed wire fences and sentry towers.

Almost two-thirds of the evacuee population at Rohwer were United States citizens. On March 11, 1943, the camp reached its peak population with 8,475 evacuee residents. During its three (3) years of operation two hundred seventy-four (274) men volunteered from the Rohwer Center for service in the United States Army. The high morale of the Rohwer camp was further marked by their publication of the Rohwer Transmitter, a weekly news bulletin edited by Kinuko Oga.

One of the evacuees maintained a personal diary during her stay at the Rohwer Relocation Center. Arriving on October 31, 1942, this woman recorded in her diary: we "could see the points of the barbed wire fences with droplets of rain stuck on them. Camp looked like some regimented metropolis - orderly rows of lights, quite a sprawling village . . . We were herded off the cars - MP's grabbed our arms as we slipped into the soft mud."

Though the American relocation centers bore little resemblance to concentration camps, they were areas of enforced inhabitance. In spite of the living conditions, both the evacuees and the administrators endeavored to make camp life resemble normal life as much as possible. Buddhist and Christian religious groups were organized, parties and shows were held by the evacuees for their own entertainment and schools with evacuee teachers and Caucasion supervisors were opened.

Federal policy in all relocation camps was that of segregation to separate the "loyal" from the "disloyal" evacuees. Such factors as study or travel in Japan, ability to speak Japanese, or the purchase of United States Savings Bonds were determinants in ascertaining the "loyalty" of Japanese-Americans. If an evacuee was considered "loyal" he could be issued a work permit which allowed him to leave the camp for a specific destination in order to take a pre-arranged job. However, no Japanese-Americans were allowed to return to California until World War II was ended.

8. Significance (Continued - Page 3)

According to camp director Ray Johnston, "The evacuees were never accepted at their true worth by the people of the State and the surrounding community." His overall reaction to the evacuees was that they were "just folks." Another administration official, Austin Smith, thought that the greatest difficulty at the center was a lack of qualified personnel to operate the facility.

During its 1,170 days of operation, the Rohwer camp housed over 10,000 persons. Despite the fact that sixty-five (65%) percent of the evacuees were American citizens, the government felt that their ancestry was sufficient reason during this time of stress to cause their confinement. Near the end of the war, even before the Japanese surrender, the evacuees were gradually allowed to leave the camp. The last group left on November 30, 1945, and the Rohwer Relocation Camp was officially closed.

The Rohwer Relocation Center represents a unique experience in American history. Though nine other such facilities existed in the central United States, the Rohwer Center site is especially significant because of the many physical remains. The cemetery and monuments, water tank, concrete foundations and several original buildings remain as tangible evidence of the city that once stood in these southeast Arkansas fields.
